

Alexander Klinge, Berlin School of Economics

Alexander Klinge is a Research Assistant at the Institute for Climate Protection, Energy and Mobility (IKEM) in the field of Energy Efficiency. Focused on the decarbonization of the energy sector through independent evaluation of policies and recommendations for change. He is assisting the implementation of numerous European and world-wide projects.

His academic career was accompanied by professional experiences, such as freelance work in event organization and an internship at an energy management system operator. He has been studying the field of European Economic Policies with a focus on low-carbon Energy Policies. Currently he is finishing his Master's degree in Political Economy of European Integration at the Berlin School of Economics